THE pot calling the kettle black has a parallel in the case of Johann Most, better able to stand "a fight to a finish" publisher of the anarchist paper Frei- with their employes than nine-tenths of heit, who calls the newly organized Order of Independent Revolutionists a pack of dynamiters. Most's entire reputation is based upon his incendiary utterances, for which he was expelled first terances, for which he was expelled first from Germany and then from England, taking up his residence in New York, where he has carried on a propaganda of through his paper the resort to assassinathrough his paper the resort to assassination as a means of obtaining the alleged rights of the proletariat, as he has seen fit to erroneously designate those who toil not nor spin, but spend their time in denouncing those, who, through industry and frugality, have become employers instead of remaining in the struggle that had never resolutely asserted.

While there were strong business reasons for starting the Homestead works to fill pressing orders, they had been fully considered before the Carnegle managers made their stand. They were not in error in the calculation that, with the tens of thousands of workingmen made idle by multiplied trusts and reduction of wages, they could readily man their entire works; but they had overlooked one factor in the dustry and frugality, have become employers instead of remaining in the ranks of the employed. There is no place in America for such men as Most or such associations as the Order of Independent Revolutionists. Constitutional safeguards for the liberty of speech and of the press should not be construed to protect conspirators and the apostles of assassination in the exercise of their nefarious plans. The country has had quite enough of secret associations which not only sanction but advocate the "removal" of persons offensive to the membership of the society, and the boldly avowed purpose of the Order of Independent Revolutionists, which has taken root in the city of New York, should furnish a sufficient pretext for its suppression.
